ABSTRACT

Until 1970 the philosophy resources at the Academy Library were used in connection with academic studies in English, history, social sciences, or an occasional philosophy course. During that year philosophy courses were re-introduced into the regular academic program and the development of the philosophy collection was begun. This bibliography combines two aspects of the developing collection: first, it lists some of the works that any undergraduate academic library should have; and second, it is designed to render more accessible to the Cadets some of the book resources available in support of the philosophy classes. The first section of the bibliography is an arrangement by name of the philosopher and includes one or more of his works and/or one or more critical works about him. The second section is composed of general works and is arranged by author. The material included is largely oriented towards Western philosophical thought. (Author/JAB)

FOREWORD

The term philosophy is derived from philos, loving, and sophos, wise, being, therefore, the love of wisdom or knowledge. Its present application encompasses the study of metaphysics, epistemology, ethics, logic, and aesthetics.

In early times philosophy covered all facets of learning and during the middle ages included the sciences and liberal arts. The eighteenth and most of the nineteenth century saw philosophy divided into two distinct branches: natural philosophy and mental or moral philosophy. The former was taught from the earliest years at the Military Academy by the Department of Natural and Experimental Philosophy which covered mechanics, hydraulics, pneumatics, optics, chemistry, magnetism, and astronomy. In 1818 the teaching of ethics was assigned to the USMA Chaplain who taught this discipline as Professor of Geography, History, and Ethics. By 1853 the same department introduced the study of logic. During the brief period of the Five Year Course at the Academy (1854-61) ethics was studied as part of the fifth class "English Studies and Literature" Course.

The philosophy course as presently taught at the Military Academy was begun in 1969 as part of the program of studies in the Department of English and is given to members of the first class. The publication of this Library Bulletin is designed to provide a finding aid for cadets and faculty in the location of appropriate course-support material and, hopefully, as a convenient bibliographic guide for permanent reference.

INTRODUCTION

The United States Military Academy Library has been acquiring resources in philosophy over an extended period of years. These materials were probably used most frequently in connection with academic studies in English, history, or social sciences, as well as for courses in philosophy when such courses have been given. Within the past year philosophy courses have been re-introduced into the academic program with the result that the philosophy collection has assumed a new relationship vis-a-vis the curriculum. The acquisitions program in this area has, therefore, both intensified and accelerated.

This bibliography combines two aspects of the developing philosophy collection: first, to list some of the works that any undergraduate academic library should have; and second, to render more accessible to the Cadets some of the book resources available in support of the philosophy classes.

There are two sections to the bibliography. The first is an arrangement by name of the philosopher and includes one or more of his works and/or one or more critical works about him. The second section is composed of general works and is arranged by author. The material included is largely oriented to the area of Western philosophical thought.

It is intended that this bibliography be indicative rather than definitive. For a complete record of the Library's holdings, the card catalog must be consulted. All titles included were in the USMA Library as of 30 November 1969.

I thank Major Alex Vardamis, of the English Department, who saw the project through from the beginning and offered much advice, Mr. J. Thomas Russell for his assistance in regard to layout and format, Mrs. Isabel Edmands for withdrawing, xeroxing, and refiling the cards, Mrs. Yvonne Ewegen for typing the drafts and working on innumerable clerical details, and Miss Genevieve E. Crane of the English Department, for typing the bibliography in its final format. The responsibility for any errors is mine.
